

Posted on Monday, 04.11.11

Share

3

email

print

comment

Miami Herald

Web Search powered by YAHOO! SEARCH

Search

Top Searches: Obituaries | Horoscopes | Lottery | Calendar

Civil War marker in Atlanta stirs controversy

BY RAY HENRY
ASSOCIATED PRESS

ATLANTA -- A new plaque unveiled in downtown Atlanta ends more than a century of awkward silence by commemorating the burning of the city during the Civil War, although some black residents want it moved from a street dedicated to the slain civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr.

State authorities posted the new plaque as part of a campaign to tell the stories of people who were previously ignored - blacks, women, Southern Unionists - when many of the state's 1,000 historical markers were installed in preparation for the war's centennial in 1961. At the time, Southern states were being rocked by the civil rights movement and desegregation. Racial tension in the 20th century at times shaped views about the 19th century struggle.

The new marker dedicated Monday is the first in Georgia to explain one of the war's most important events: the burning of Atlanta on Nov. 15, 1864, by Union forces under the command of Major Gen. William T. Sherman. Modern historians estimate that 40 percent of the city was destroyed.

"This was the beginning of the hard hand of war policy that Sherman decided needed to be brought about if the Confederacy was going to be shown that the war was over," said W. Todd Groce, president of the Georgia Historical Society.

But in their attempt to write a more inclusive history, Groce and others ignited a new controversy.

The monument was placed on the site of Atlanta's old business district, where the fires began. It's now a plaza overlooking Martin Luther King Jr. Drive. Leaders of the Atlanta chapter of the NAACP call the monument an affront to King and are holding a news conference Tuesday to ask that it be moved elsewhere.

"It strikes us as a kind of in-the-face thing," said the Rev. R.L. White, president the local NAACP chapter. "We know that history is history and we seek not to try and get rid of history, but we say that plaque could have been placed in a different place."

After defending the positioning of the marker, Groce said in an interview after the ceremony that he is willing to discuss whether the sign - now cemented to the ground - should be moved.

"I'm trying to figure out what's the right thing to do with this," he said.

Other black leaders who appeared at the unveiling said the marker is in the right spot.

City Councilor Michael Julian Bond, who is black, has maternal ancestors who were slaves until Sherman's army captured the city. An old slave auction house stood just a few blocks away from new marker. After the war, Bond's family lived in a predominately black neighborhood called Shermantown, which was named in honor of the Union general.

"The basic roots of freedom for African Americans effectively began in this spot," Bond said.

Bond posed for pictures beside the marker with a distant cousin of the Confederate mayor who surrendered the city. He pointed to the pin on his jacket, which was emblazoned with the city's motto, "Resurgens" and its official seal, a mythical fiery bird that rises from its own ashes. Both were inspired by Atlanta's rise from ruin after the Civil War.

"It's kind of a schizophrenic idea of acknowledging, hey, we're going to rise from our own destruction but not acknowledging that very same destruction," he said.

On the Cheap $650
The Miami Herald
THE NEW K...
The most in-depth news.
Now at 50% off regular home delivery!
Just SUBSCRIBE NOW! $20

email

print

Share

Twitter

SHOCKING: 46" LED TV's for only $98.76!
Savannah: Over 1,000 Samsung 46" LED TV's selling for $98.76 each!

Dermatologists Hate Her!
Local Mom Reveals $5 Trick To Erase Wrinkles With Shocking Results

Savannah: HCG Diet UNCOVERED!
Exclusive report on the HCG Diet. Read the shocking results.

MORE FLORIDA WIRES

- More bison issues at troubled Dakotas ranch
- Fla. lawmakers advance welfare drug testing bill
- Dead twin's DNA helps ID Texas body in barrel
- Mega Money jackpot rises to estimated $600,000
- Mayor: Tarballs still hitting Ala., cleanup needed
- Man shot and killed after breaking into home

More

VIDEOS

VIDEO FROM OUR PARTNERS

NDN VIDEO