| Staging the Question |

- Preliminary questions: What are civil rights? What are human rights? Can you make a list of what you believe are civil rights and human rights?
- Students will be shown an image of the Atlanta Student Movement historical marker.
- Students will be shown an image of a flyer, The Student Movement and You.
- Using the historical marker and flyer as the Q-Focus, students will generate a list of questions using the Question Formulation Technique (QFT) (Right Question Institute). Follow the steps of the QFT to identify open ended questions. Choose an open ended question to explore as the supporting question or use the supporting question suggested below.

Supporting Question(s)

How were the goals and strategies of the Atlanta Student Movement communicated to other students and the public?

Formative Performance Task

Students will split into small groups of 3-4 students. On the board, several documents will be projected. 1-2 per class period for several class periods. The documents will be read together as a class, but discussions and analysis will happen collaboratively in the small groups. Students will answer the following:

- What are the key issues being communicated? (examples: segregation, lack of economic opportunity, history of oppression/mistreatment)
- What are the proposed actions being communicated? (proposals for picketing, economic boycott, gatherings, sit ins, other direct action)

After each example is projected and read, students will be asked to compare and contrast the documents and come up with a small-group consensus answer to the Supporting Question.

At the end of the sessions, students will present their lists on either large butcher paper sheets or a Google Slide.

ARGUMENT Students will write a paragraph that answers the compelling question: What were the goals, strategies and ultimate impacts of the Atlanta Student Movement?

EXTENSION Individually, students will create a poster, flyer, or one-page newspaper advertisement, that seeks to convince others to join the civil rights movement. Students can take either a historical approach or adapt this to a Taking Informed Action approach.

TAKING INFORMED ACTION The informed action task would involve connecting a poster, flyer, etc., to a current issue/problem. Examples: Black Lives Matter, plastics pollution, refugee rights, etc.
